ABSTRACT

This bibliography of books and journals has been designed to aid San Diego and Imperial County (California) health care professionals in dealing with patients from three special population groups prevalent in that area: Hispanics, Native Americans, and Pan Asians. The bibliography is divided into four sections, the first of which lists general references. The remaining three sections are devoted to each of the respective groups. The guide concludes with a list of associations and agencies which disseminate further information. Literature pertaining to the Native American Indian population is limited primarily to Southwest Indians. Pan Asians include refugee populations such as Cambodians, Vietnamese, and Pacific Islanders. According to a brief introduction, the guide is highly selective and includes references that are easy to locate or order. References are limited, for the most part, to the past ten years, although some classic texts with earlier imprints are included. The most pertinent references are included at the end of each section as further readings for those who want a more comprehensive review of the literature. (KH)

Introduction

It is important for health personnel to be aware of cultural differences in working with ethnically diverse patient populations. Different values, religious attitudes, family interactions and health beliefs will have an impact on the health care process. Health personnel with an understanding of these cultural factors may establish a better rapport with the patient and can reduce misunderstandings caused by cultural differences.

This bibliography has been designed to aid San Diego and Imperial County health care professionals in dealing with patients from three special population groups prevalent in the San Diego and Imperial County area--Hispanics, Native Americans and Pan Asians. Literature pertaining to Native American Indian Populations has been limited primarily to Southwest Indians. Pan Asians include refugee populations such as Cambodians and Vietnamese as well as Pacific Islanders.

A variety of sources were used in compiling these references. Health care professionals who work with patients from the targeted populations supplied references which they have found useful. Computerized database searches of the medical, educational, and social science literature were conducted. The literature of anthropology was searched manually in several indexes. Additional bibliographies were used as secondary sources.

In order for this guide to be practical and easy to use, it is highly selective and includes references that are easy to locate or order. References are limited for the most part to the current ten years, although some classic texts with earlier imprints have been included. The most pertinent references are listed first as recommended readings. Additional references are included at the end of each section as further readings for those who want a more comprehensive review of the literature.
